In his speech yesterday, Mr. Marshall attempt ed to be very severe, not only upon the democracy, but upon Mr. Clay and Mr. Dixon's friends. He asked what Mr. Dixon had ever done for the party. Three years ago Mr. Crittenden had been called home from the Senate to win a rate which Mr. Dixon could not. He had won it. He killed and buried Mr. Powell; and Mr. Powell had slept the sleep of death, not three days, but three years. In 1851, Mr. Dixon was called out by the whigs, and what did he do? Why, he called Lazarus from the dead, and Lazarus came forth. A woman, who, it is said, had been in the city about a fortnight, stopped at the Manches ter house on the 7th inst., with an infant, which she said was about nine weeks old. The child is represented as being an exceedingly bright and beautiful babe, and the mother a well dressed and lady-like woman, between twenty and thirty years of age. She called her name French, and said she was from Canada, and that her husband was dead In a conver sation with Mr. Sheriff Munroe, at the Manchester House, she wished him to keep her and the child during the winter, which Mr. M. declined doing. The following day this woman left the Manchester House, and went to No. 93 Amoskeag Corporation. We have not heard what called her there, but learn that she told a similar story there, and that the man of the house recognized her as a girl whom he had seen in a Lowell mill, and told his wife that she was not married, but came there evidently with the intention of leaving the child at the house. This suspicion caused her to be closely watched.—She remained at No. 93 over Sunday, and left the house at about three o'clock on Monday afternoon, in a coach, and was conveyed to the deput, where she remained with the infant until the five o'clock down train, when she took the cars.

The abolition of the corn laws of England—opening the ports of Great Britain to American breadstuffs and provisions—was a triumph achieved by the American cotton grower over the feudal aristocracy of the old world. It furnished bread to the laboring masses of Great Britain and Ireland, at the same time that it clothed them, and formed the first step towards the amelioration of their condition. It affected in processed in the market of the provision of their condition. It affected in processed in the provision of the product of the provision of their condition. What Wishing to retain my stock in the Louisvilla and has been effected in England by the the power of American Agriculture. must, in due course of time, extend to every commercial and manufacturing country on the continent of Europe .-The battle against commercial restrictions is now waging in France, Belgium, Germany and Italy, and must eventually terminate in the abrogation of all government monopolies.

In enumerating the leading agricultural staples of our country, we are naturally led to the consideration of the Tobacco plant. It is not my purpose here to inquire how far the use of Tobacco, in any of its forms, may be regarded as an elegant accomplishment, or whether its culture should be encouraged, as one of the necessaries of life. In Holland, on the shores of the Baltic, and other countries of Europe, I believe, it has been regarded as a medicinial plant, and an antidote against prevailing diseases: while in some of the German States, its growth, owing to the general use of the weed, is enforced by law .-Be this as it may, the use of tobacco, in some shape, has become general in every quarter of the globe, and its production an object of national importance, Tobacco enters largely into our foreign exchanges, being second only to cotton on the list of our agricultural exports. There is no nation with which we trade that does not use tobacco; while in several European countries it is a government monopoly, and one of the chief articles from which revenue is derived. In several States of this Union, it constitutes the chief staple article of agriculture, and its producers are large consumers of the ordinary products of the farm and dairy of other States; while in some of the Northern and Northwestern States, its culture has been introduced, as even more profitable than the usual agricultural industry of our farmers.

At all events, the action of government is invoked not to slaken in its endeavors to induce the governments of France, Belgium and A Austria, to abandon their present tobacco monopoles, and to open their ports to the reception of this, as well as other agricultural staples of our country. I am aware that these endeavors up to this moment, have met with but little success; but this constitutes no valid reason why they should be abandoned. The age of monopolies is passed, and the check which every monopoly imposes on other branches of commerce, and through it, indirectly, on the revenue, added to our own governmental remonstrances, can in the end hardly fail to open the eyes of those nations, and to effect the desired object.

This error, however, has been corrected by experience. Without including our large exports during the famine year, when we were almost the only sellers in the markets of Europe, our exports show a respectable increase in ordinary years: our means of transportation have inproved, production has become cheaper, distances have been shortened, by the saving of time, and in spite of all the lugubrious prophesies of our croakers, we find our farmers competing with the principal wheat growers of Europe in their own markets! American broaded and our wheat flour is quited.

SPROULE & MANDEVILLE & MANDEVI tation, interest on capital, insurance, all City Bill Poster and Distributor of Europe in their own markets! American bread-stuffs have gained a permanent foothold in the principal markets of the world, and our wheat flour is quite as great a favorite in Mark Lane, as any other species of the same article imported into England. Occasional fluctuations in prices—in particular years of large crops—must of course, be sub mitted to in the trade of agricultural staples; but these will be met, and their influences guarded against, by a frugal, eagacious and energetic people.
